Material and Construction

Fabric arch building

Arches have been utilized in building structures for thousands of years. A curved profile has incredible strength and intrinsic ability to resist pressure from external forces. Arches are simple, strong and durable. Consequently this shape was a key element in the development of EASTCOVER space solutions. They are designed and engineered to create extremely durable permanent and deployable structures in a large range of sizes that are well able to withstand wind, snow and gravitational loadings. EASTCOVER has perfected the arch design so well that the tension fabric structures can weigh up to 50% less than other conventional structures and yet still have the equivalent strength. Not only can EASTCOVER tension fabric be used as an effective roofing material for large spans, its lightweight nature, translucent and reflective properties, and environmental adaptability can also be taken advantage of in all types of construction.
